

King (CHINOOK) SALMON Alaska's state fish and one of the most important sport fish native to the Pacific coast of North America. In the ocean, the King salmon is a robust, deep-bodied fish with a bluish-green coloration on the back, which fades, to a silvery color on both sides and white on the belly. The king salmon is perhaps the most highly prized sport fish in Alaska. Trolling with rigged herring is the favored method of angling in saltwater.

SILVER (COHO) SALMON Found Southeast Alaska coastal waters and extremely adaptable. They also occur in nearly all-accessible bodies of freshwater. Adult in salt water or newly arrived in fresh water are bright silver with small black spots on the back and on the upper lobe of the caudal fin. The silver salmon is a premier sport fish and is taken in fresh and salt water.

PINK (HUMPBACK) SALMON An adult fish returning to coastal waters is bright steely blue on top and silvery on the sides with many large black spots on the back and entire tail fin. Its scales are very small and the flesh is pink. Most pink salmon spawn within a few miles of the coast and spawning within the intertidal zone at the mouth of streams are very common. This species is plentiful in the region.

SOCKEYE (RED) SALMON Can be distinguished from other Pacific salmon by the long, slender gill rakers on the first gill arch as well as the lack of large spots on the back and tail. Sockeye salmon are anadromous; they spend much of their life in the ocean but enter fresh water to spawn. The popularity of sport fishing for sockeye salmon is rapidly growing.

CHUM SALMON Ocean fresh chum salmon are metallic greenish-blue on the dorsal surface (top) with fine blue speckles. Chum have fewer but larger gill rakers than other salmon. Sport fishermen generally catch chum salmon incidental to fishing for other Pacific salmon in either salt or fresh water.

ROCKFISH More than 30 species occur in Alaska's coastal waters. Adult rockfish range in size from 5 to 41 inches, with most species attaining sizes between 20 to 24 inches. These fish are characterized by a large mouth, and pelvic fins attached forward near the pectoral fins. Rock fish appear somewhat perch-like or bass-like, and are often called sea bass. All species have flesh that is delicious to eat.

PACIFIC HALIBUT Are more elongated than most flatfish, the width being about one-third the length. Halibut have both eyes on their dark upper side; the color on the dark side varies but tends to assume the coloration of the ocean bottom. The underside is lighter, appearing more like the sky from below. Halibut are regarded as a highly desirable sport fish.

DOLLY VARDEN Belong to a group of fish called char. The light spots on their sides distinguish them from most trout and salmon, which are usually black spotted or speckled. Anadromous and freshwater resident varieties are found throughout the southern part of Southeast Alaska. Dolly Varden is one of Alaska's most important and sought after sport fish.

CUTTHROAT TROUT Cutthroat occur as both sea-run and resident. The resident form lives in a wide variety of habitat, from small headwater tributaries, to large lakes and rivers. Sea-run cutthroat are usually found in river or stream systems with accessible lakes. Cutthroat are aggressive feeders and will hit almost any bait, lure or fly.

GRAYLING The grayling is an elegantly formed cousin of the trout. They are one of the most unusual and beautiful fish of Alaska. Grayling are generally dark on the back and have iridescent gray sided. They have varying numbers of black spots scattered along the anterior portion of both sides. Grayling are especially popular because of their willingness to rise to a dry fly.

RAINBOW TROUT Often one of the most respected and sought after of Alaska's native game fish. Rainbow trout occur as both freshwater resident and sea-run races. They possess the well-known streamlined salmon form. Rainbow trout are voracious feeders and strong swimmers, willing to hit a wide variety of lures, baits, and flies.

STEELHEAD TROUT The steelhead is a rainbow trout that has spent a part of its life in the sea. The nature of their differing lifestyles as resulted in subtle differences in color, shape, and general appearance. Adult steelhead like fast, deep, running water. Fish the deep holes in the streams. Fish the fast, white water areas, and behind floods and log jams. A catch and release policy is encouraged at Salmon Falls.
